Q.6 Case # 1 15

Sagar P. had been nominated to the board of the Horizon Industries (p) Ltd., as workman-director six months ago. He had been with horizon over twenty years. Starting off as substitute mill-hand in the paint shop at one of the company's manufacturing facilities, he had been made permanent on the job five years later. He had no formal education. He felt this was a handicap, but he made up for it with a willingness to learn and a certain enthusiasm on the job. He was soon marked as a works manager as someone to watch out for. Simultaneously, Sagar also came to the attention of the president of the Horizon Employee's Union who drafted him into union activities. Even while he got promoted twice during the period to become the head colour mixer last year, Sagar had gradually moved up the union hierarchy and had been thrice elected secretary of the union.

Labour-management relations at Horizon were not always cordial. This was largely because the company had not been recording a consistently good performance. There were frequent cuts in production every year because of go-slows and strikes by workmen-most of them related to wage hikes and bonus payments. With a view to ensuring a better understanding on the part of labour, the problems of company management, the Horizon board, led by chairman and managing director Avinash Chaudhri, began to toy with the idea of taking on a workman on the board. What started off as a hesitant move snowballed, after a series of brainstorming sessions with executives and meetings with the union leaders, into a situation in which Sagar found himself promoted to the Horizon board as a workman-director.

It was an untested ground for the company. But the novelty of it all excited both the management and the labour force. The board members-all functional heads went out of their way to make Sagar comfortable and the later also responded quiet well. He got used to the ambience of the boardroom and the sense of power it conveyed. Significantly, he was soon at home with the perspective of top management and began to see each issue from both sides.
